ABSTRACT

Scores of U.S. companies have actually "inverted," turning themselves into nominally foreign companies so as to take advantage of such firms' ability to bring cash earned abroad into the United States tax free. Unfortunately, such construction has been delayed and restricted because of the vast number of approvals required from agencies that include the Environmental Protection Agency, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the Department of Energy, and many others. Competitive corporate taxes, easier repatriation of foreign earnings, a less burdensome regulatory environment, expanded domestic energy production, and trade deals that give U.S. companies a fair chance to compete-together these will create jobs, accelerate growth, and lead to a new era of American prosperity.
